Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: ...round here. I never see him fore. Pattys tense muscles relaxed. Plainly retribution and recovery of the stolen goods were impossible, inasmuch as the culprit was unknown. Dont ye fret, Arabella, dont ye fret, she soothed, patting the little girls heaving shoulders. Like nough well find somethin else fur breakfast. My! but twas mean--when he must a known ye couldnt run! she cried angrily. Ye see, its dem, she added in a low voice, turning to Maggie ana pointing to little Arabellas twisted, misshapen feet. She want finished up right, somehow, I reckon, an dey dont go good. Maggie was silent. A faint something was stirring within her--a something that had lain dormant for long months. Course nobody likes ter lose der breakfast, went on Patty; but dars heaps o chances yit, an a gleeful laugh interrupted her. Breakfast? Why, Ive got breakfast--lots of it, cried Maggie, joyously; enough for all of us! And she tore open the bag in her hand and proudly displayed the four buns. Say, you are a brick, cried Patty; but she snatched back the hand that Arabella greedily reached toward the bag. No, no, Arabella, wait for twinnie! Come, she added to Maggie, well git de rest o my famly, Ye see dars three of us, me an de twins. Theyre! Arabella an Clarabella. Kind o purty names--dont ye think? she asked as they trudged along the street. I named em myself out of a piece of a book I found in a ash barrel last winter. Oh, dey had names, course, before-- Sue an Sally--but they want purty ones, so I changed em. Names is a thing ye dont have ter have if ye dont like em; dey aint like measles...
