

It has been said for many years that our children are growing up too fast and therefore have only a short childhood where they can do the things that children do, or rather did, such as building dens, climbing trees and playing freely and safely in the area in which they live. Magical moments - Childhood memories of Eastmoor is set in the year 1947 and describes the activities that a group of young children got up to throughout the twelve month period, commencing with sledging in January and ending with the opening their presents on Christmas Day. The activities, thirty-two in number, form a diary that the young girl, Jenny Jarvis, kept. Here the antics of herself, her younger brother, Jimmy and his mates are described, along with comments, often sarcastic, from Jenny and Jimmys mother. The activities described all actually took place, and many times too over a substantial period, and not only on Wakefields Eastmoor estate. This pattern of play by young children would have been seen throughout the country in 1947 where there were young children, and shows just how much freedom they had to carry out this vital part of their development. Parents rarely worried where their children were and most were glad to see them out in the open air enjoying themselves with their friends. This freedom to play commenced early and it was not unusual to see children as young as four, already at school, playing out on the street where they lived with their friends. At the other end of the age scale both boys and girls in their early teens played out, this usually coming to an end when they left school at fifteen and started work. Even then during the long summer evenings while the older boys were playing a mammoth game of football or touch-and-pass (as in rugby areas such as Eastmoor) the older girls would not be far away. How times have changed, with both boys and girls whatever their age now preferring the haven of their bedrooms with their televisions, laptops and mobile phones. The word sad springs to mind. I wonder how many of todays children will be able to sit down when in the twilight of their lives and vividly describe the highlights of their childhood? I suspect that few will be able to do so.
