Excerpt: ...gate, at least they appear to be such by their habit, but what will surprise you is, they are all three blind of the right eye, and have their heads, beards, and eyebrows shaved. They say they ate but just come to Bagdad, where they never were before; it being night, and not know Vol. 1. o ing where to find a lodging, they happened by chance to knock at this gate, and pray us, for the love of heaven, to have compassion on them, and receive them into the house. They care not what place we put them in, provided they may be under shelter; they would be satisfied with a stable. They are young and handsome, and seem not to want spirit. But I cannot without laughing think of their amusing and uniform figure. Here Safie laughed so heartily, that the two sisters and the porter could not refrain from laughing also. My dear sister, said she, you will permit them to come in; it is impossible but that with such persons as I have described them to be, we shall finish the day better than we began it; they will afford us diversion enough, and put us to no charge, because they desire shelter only for this night, and resolve to leave us as soon as day appears. Zobeide and Amene made some difficulty to grant Safies request, for reasons which she herself well knew. But being very desirous to obtain this favour, they could not refuse her; Go then, said Zobeide, and bring them in, but do not forget to acquaint them that they must not speak of anything which does not concern them, and cause them to read what is written over the gate. Safie ran out with joy, and in a little time after returned with the three calenders. At their entrance they made a profound obeisance to the ladies, who rose up to receive them, and told them courteously that they were welcome,...
